70 hours per week – Possible? Required?

The entire industry is discussing a recent interview statement by a beacon of IT industry. Social media is flowing with thoughts in favor and against the model suggested. Is it possible and required now, in India? What are the challenges of such suggestion?

1. As per Indian Labour Law it is not at all possible and it is against the provisions of Factory or Commercial Establishment or any other regulatory legislations.
2. Still do we have to think about this and discuss this? A few points are stated below for furthering the discussion, of the statement.
 - a. Physiologically the productivity will not be as expected – “More hours will give more Productivity”; no, it will not”. Health-wise, more such extended job will take you not to the Common Morbidities but to COMORBILITY condition.
 - b. We should not compare us with Richer Countries (Economically Richer) where they work for fewer hours but produce more with each hour of work. Productivity is referred to the rate at which inputs are turned into outputs. (for eg. In current industry condition – (i) number of Customer Call is served in an hour or (ii) number of Electric Vehicle is assembled in a day. With Extended hours of working, physical/mental fatigue will invariably decrease the quality deliverables.
 - c. It is suitable for those who are founders of Start-Up companies, who wanted to prove themselves in the industry and to grow rich (at the cost of their health).
3. It is not the number of hours/manpower, which will give more productivity, but it is the TECHNOLOGY INNOVATION, which will give more productivity, income to Employer & Employee, and prosper the Country's economy on whole.
4. So, It is the duty of Industry and Government to come together for Innovation by way of Technology improvisation which will enhance the expected Productivity/Economy.

Quest:

Dear Sree,

I have been recently promoted as a manager. As a part of the role, I need to give 'on the spot feedback' to my peers who worked with me as colleagues in the last two years. Is there any easy way to handle this situation with our hurting the egos – Krithika

Solution:

Dear Krithika,

- 🎵 Feedback plays a crucial role in motivating and improving employees' work performance. However, most of us have fear in receiving the feedback from our supervisors and managers do not feel comfortable in providing negative feedback.
- 🎵 You can use Situation-Behavior-Impact™ (SBI™) model to frame your feedback. The SBI™ feedback tool outlines a simple structure that you can use to deliver effective feedback without touching the egos of the individuals.

SBI™ stands for:

Situation: you outline the situation you're referring to, so that the context is clear and specific.

For example, you could say:

"During yesterday morning's project meeting, when you gave your presentation..."

Behavior: you discuss the precise behavior that you want to address.

For example:

"During yesterday morning's team meeting, when you gave your presentation, I noticed that you weren't able to answer questions about two of your slides. Your sales calculations were also incorrect."

Impact: finally, you highlight the impact of the person's behavior on you, the team and the organization.

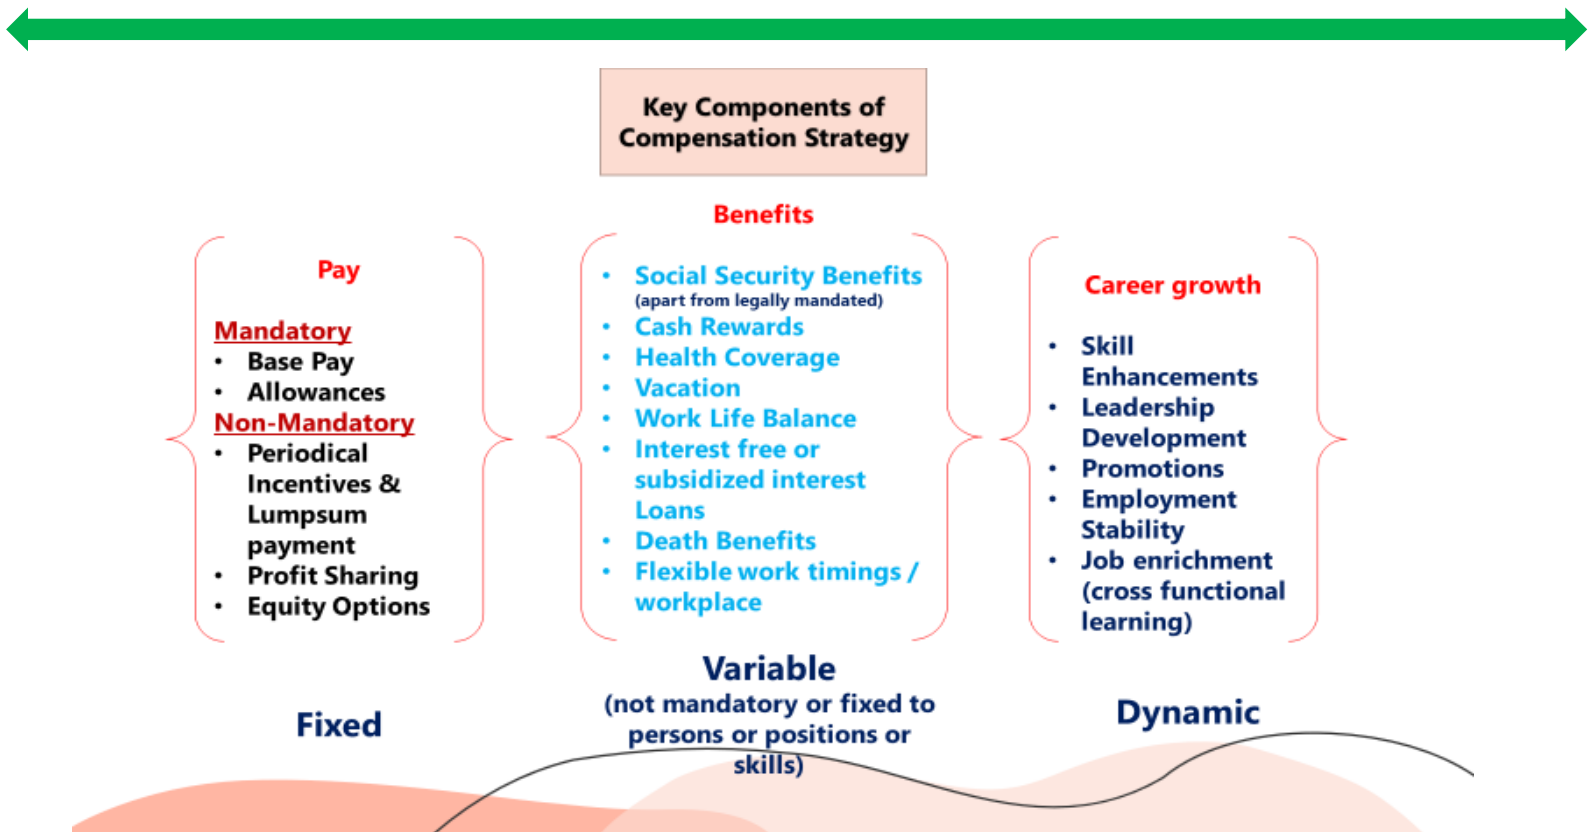

For example, you could say:

"During yesterday morning's team meeting, when you gave your presentation, I noticed that you weren't able to answer questions about two of your slides. Your sales calculations were also incorrect. The entire board was there, and I'm concerned it may have affected the reputation of our team."

Also, remember that SBI™ isn't just for negative situations. You can also use it to give praise or highlight a situation where someone has excelled, and help them to think about how they can build on this.

For example, you might say, "Your planning skills are very good, and your eye for detail is excellent. Perhaps you could help to project manage another big piece of work we have coming up?"
